Account of the death of Middleton; who had been in France some 4 months and a Captain for just some 15 days, (See half way down following.)

was sparingly doled out in the proportion of about one-eighth of a pint to a man. Advantage was taken of the lull to evacuate the wounded, but the survivors were too few and too weary to clear out the trench, which had been almost flattened by the ferocious shelling.

Throughout the night of the 24-25th the enemy again heavily shelled the Australian position, and no sleep was possible for the defenders. The battalion was still south of the main road, A and B Companies having relieved C and D in the firing line.

July 25th opened with a tornado of shells from the German "heavies," and losses continued at such a rapid rate that Lieut-Col Howell-Price, after a personal reconnaissance, ordered a forward move close up to the 8th Battalion line, hoping thus to escape the worst of the barrage. It was at this stage that Captain R. O. Middleton and Lieut J. S. F. Bartlett, both acting as company commanders, were killed. They had gone back for the purpose of guiding their companies forward but were caught in the curtain of gun-fire. Howell-Price thereupon led the survivors forward himself. By 10 a.m. this manoeuvre was completed.

Just prior to the advance, Lieut H. S. Chapman, the battalion signalling officer, was examining a map in company with Major D. T. Moore and several signallers, when a high velocity shell hit the back of the trench. Chapman was killed by the concussion and Signaller W. A. Oates was blown to pieces. The same shell killed Signallers Clarrie Page, "Snow" Pickering, and Rupert Clarke. Strange to relate, Oates predicted, while at Gallipoli, the actual date of his death.

"I decided to push forward one company," wrote Howell-Price in his report on this day. "But when I returned to my trenches I found they were quite untenable. A Company had been practically wiped out, and

K. July 25th. 1916. Det:

Big chap, stout, well built, fresh complexion, clean shaven. On July 25th the Regiment were in trenches at Pozieres. Informant quite near the Captain. During the afternoon he saw a shell burst near the Captain, blowing his leg off. Informant saw him put on the stretcher, and then he had to go on a message. Cpl. Smith of Headquarters told informant after that the Captain had died at the Dressing Station near the Chalk Pit which was about three miles off.

I knew Capt. Middleton; he had been in B. Co. and his name was Roy, and his second initial was O. not C. He was missing from the regiment on about 24.7.16, and I was told by Pte. E. Turnbull of B. Co. the day afterwards, that Capt. Middleton had been blown to bits by a shell, and they had only been able to find pieces of him. He was quite sure that it was Capt. Middleton. This was at Pozieres. There was only one Capt. Middleton in the Ln.

After the capture of Pozieres on 25th July, while B. Coy of the 3rd Battn. was holding the recently taken trenches, both Middleton and Bartlett were killed by shell fire. They were both buried behind the lines.

Informant was in B. Coy, of which both Middleton and Bartlett were Officers. He did not actually see either Officers killed, but was in the same trench at the time, and there can be no doubt as to what happened.

Informant states that on the night of July 24th 1916 at Pozieres, this officer (in reality in A. Coy, but nearly always in B. Coy) was killed by a shell, right in the village after it had been taken by our men. The reason for thinking that a shell was the cause of death is that there were no Germans in the neighbourhood who might have fired bullets. Informant is very much afraid that the Captain did not have a proper burial, as the Regiment had to go on advancing.

Battle of Pozières

23 July 1916 - 07 August 1916

Pozières, a small village in the Somme valley in France, was the scene of bitter and costly fighting for the 1st, 2nd and 4th Australian Divisions in mid-1916. The village was captured initially by the 1st Division on 23 July 1916. The division clung to its gains despite almost continuous artillery fire and repeated German counter-attacks but suffered heavily. By the time it was relieved on 27 July it had suffered 5,285 casualties.

The 2nd Division took over from the 1st and mounted two further attacks - the first, on 29 July, Was a costly failure; the second, on 2 August, resulted in the seizure of further German positions beyond the village. Again, the Australians suffered heavily from retaliatory Bombardments. They were relieved on 6 August, having suffered 6,848 casualties. The 4th Division was next into the line at Pozières. It too endured a massive artillery bombardment and defeated a German counter-attack on 7 August; this was the last attempt by the Germans to retake Pozieres.

“---At this stage the 3rd Battalion, still south of the main road, was ordered to advance and connect the posts of the 8th along the northern edge of Pozieres. Its commander, Colonel Owen Howell-Price, gave instructions to Captain Middleton (72) and Lieutenant Bartlett, then acting in command of the companies that were to move. On their returning to their men, both were killed,”

Plaque installed on the Vacluse War Memorial, 1918

"A grateful tribute to the gallant men who fought for us in the Great War" is the heartfelt message on the memorial at Vacluse on the corner of Fitzwilliam and Wentworth Roads. The memorial was the initiative of the Vacluse Progress Association formed in May 1915. The Association's first years were concerned almost wholly with supporting the war effort and the loss of two of its members, Roy Oswald Middleton, killed by shell explosion at Pozières on 25 July 1916 and Benjamin Digby Gibson, who drowned in Egypt on 14 January 1917, was keenly felt. Middleton was an architect who had designed a number of houses in the district, and Gibson a medical practitioner who had migrated from Ireland and settled in Vacluse in 1914.
